Millionaire ball player also a substitute teacher

By David Woods

BUFFALO, N.Y. — The Millionaire ball player of the N.Y. Yankees has also been a substitute teacher for the last nine years.

"It's a good way to earn some extra cash," said the baseball player, who requested anonymity due to his celebrity status. "I've been teaching math and science at a local high school.

I enjoy the classroom setting and the interaction with the students. It's a nice change from the field.

The kids are always excited to see me, and they seem to really enjoy my lessons. I like being able to share my knowledge and passion for the subjects I teach.

Some days I teach algebra, and other days it's chemistry. I try to make it as fun and engaging as possible for them.

I think it's important for athletes to give back to their communities and use their talents beyond the sport. To me, teaching is a way to do that.

It's a great way to stay connected with the local community and to give something back to the people who support me.

I've taught at the high school for over a decade now and I still enjoy it. It's a rewarding experience, and I feel like I'm making a difference in the lives of these students.

I've also been able to connect with some of my former teammates from college and they've been supportive of my teaching endeavors.

I know this may seem unusual for a professional baseball player, but I believe it's important to have diverse interests and experiences.

I'm grateful for the opportunity to continue teaching and to share my love of learning with these young minds.

I hope to continue teaching for many years to come and to inspire the next generation of students to pursue their dreams.

As for my baseball career, I'm still working hard and trying to contribute to my team. I know the World Series is a long way off, but I'm keeping my eye on it.

I appreciate the support from my fans and I'm looking forward to what the future holds.

Go Yankees!"